

BIBLE-SAFE ZONES

If one finds Bibles to be upsetting, forces are at work to provide one with Bible-free zones where you can go and not be offended. It's called "government facilities." It's similar to "gun-free zones" that have been provided where people can go to and feel securely protected from people with guns. One difference is that for some reason most people who are prone to shooting people seem to be unable to read signs, such as, "No Guns Permitted," while Bible-safe zones are more secure. Christians haven't been bold enough yet to carry Bible into schools, court houses, military facilities, etc., defying federal laws. Somewhere in our nation's Constitution liberal Supreme Court justices have found (must be "between the lines") that having Bibles in such places is a violation of "separation of church and state."

From the Internet I some time ago came across this article in "Todd Starnes Report," on this theme:

"A Bible was removed from the waiting room of a Chillicothe Veteran Affairs Medical Center (CVAMC) in Athens, Ohio after a veteran complained. "Our government is secular, and must remain secular," the unidentified veteran wrote.

"Mikey Weinstein, the founder of the Military Religious Freedom Foundation, fired off a letter to the medical center on behalf of the veteran—alleging that the presence of the Bible inside a government facility is a violation of the U.S. Constitution. Weinstein, a fussy little man with a strong aversion to our Lord, said the Bible's placement in the waiting room was 'illicit and unconstitutional.' In other words, 'Good Housekeeping' is fine, but the Good Book is not. The panicked VA staff scoured the entire building to ensure there were no other Bibles lurking about—waiting to spontaneously convert people. They found one.

"So, did this veteran think that this Bible was going to do something? Was it going to cause him to collapse into a coma? Was he going to wake up the next day and decide to be a Christian because it was on a table where he had been? No, this is just another example of the thought-police. If you do not think like them, then you are infringing on their rights.

"Thanks to the brave staff of the CVAMC their facility is now Scripture-free. But someone should tell these people that there is an easier way to avoid things they do not like: Do not pick them up."

Our nation has come a long way from the days of our nation's founders who seemingly misunderstood the Constitution, even supplying school children with Bibles. (Tongue in cheek.)
